Whether you're delivering a presentation or revamping your social media profiles, visual storytelling is the best way to go. When selecting pictures to use, try to keep in mind the four key characteristics of visual storytelling.
The best stories come from candid moments. It's why photo sharing has become so prevalent in the age of social media.
Replace the super-polished stock photos with snapshots that allow others to see the world through a more personal perspective.
To find images that are more authentic to your story, focus on what your brand stands for. Look for images that convey your identity and experiences as a brand, and that will resonate with your audience.

Authentic

Take, for example, Dove’s Real Beauty campaign. Instead of featuring photoshopped models, Dove featured everyday women and challenged today’s absurd beauty standards.
Visual storytelling should also take into account what's happening in the world. After all, your message doesn't exist in a bubble.
Relevant

Your message is contextualized in a milieu - a world where billions of individuals are discovering new things every single day.

Make sure your visual stories are relatable and relevant to the audience you want to target.
The only thing better than a picture is the real thing. Since you can't have real situations on a PowerPoint slide, you must settle for the next best thing.
Sensory

Close-up and macro shots are great for showing textures that audiences can almost touch. Alternatively, a long shot can also take your audience into a scene, to experience it through a wider perspective.

Visual storytelling thrives on imagery that heightens emotions and senses.
The best of visual storytelling alludes to narratives that are as old as time.
Archetypal

All of your favorite stories are tied together by recurring themes and archetypes. These are universal symbols - they can be found across many different countries and cultures.
